The Myers-Briggs Type Indicator (MBTI) is an introspective self-report questionnaire with the purpose of indicating differing psychological preferences in how people perceive the world around them and make decisions.. Though the test superficially resembles some psychological theories it is commonly classified as pseudoscience, especially as pertains to its supposed predictive abilities.

The learning styles based on Jung's theory of personality represent just one way of thinking about how people learn. While the concept of learning styles remains very popular today, research has found little evidence to support the idea that offering instruction based upon learning preferences leads to improved learning outcomes.

Kang et al. (2009) also found that curiosity enhances learning, consistent with the theory that the primary function of curiosity is to facilitate learning. This idea also motivated O'Keefe and Nadel's thinking about the factors that promote spatial learning in rodents (O'Keefe and Nadel, 1978). This idea is also popular in the education literature (e.g., Day, 1971, Engel, 2011, Engel ...
